About The Green Cup of Polo

The Green Cup of Polo, the third annual polo benefit to be played for the environment, is hosted by the Capitol Polo Club and carried out in cooperation with various embassies and non-profits in the DC area. All proceeds benefit ACORE (the American Council On Renewable Energy), EPIC (Equestrian Partners in Conservation), and EarthEcho International. It invites the public to join with diplomats, non-profit organizations and corporations in the fight against climate change, and other environmental issues.

The Green Cup of Polo has shown continuous growth since its inaugural year in 2007 where it raised $13,000 for worthy environmental causes, and was visited by more than 300 guests. In 2008, the event welcomed nearly 1000 guests and raised $90,000 in funding and product donations.

The Green Cup of Polo is one of the few events in the US that incorporate green principles into every stage of the planning process, and the first event to be certified 'green' in Washington DC. The event does everything possible to minimize its ecological footprint.

Green goes glam at eco-friendly polo match
Green Cup of Polo in the Washington area event to be 'green' certified by GreenSource.

Forget Whitehouse and being green — Spring green can also be hip. This is the message that event coordinators of the Green Cup of Polo, which took place last weekend at the Capitol Polo Club in Poolesville, were trying to drive home.

The Green Cup was the first event in the Washington area to be certified carbon neutral by the Wisconsin-based Leonardo Academy, a non-profit that certifies events and groups for reducing and offsetting greenhouse gas emissions through its Clean and Green program. The event — many of whom were wealthy and thirty-something Washington-area professionals — gathered at the club Saturday, dressed in their finest, and sipped "cocktails" made with organic vodka and imported locally produced food as they watched the match.

"This is a typical D.C. event, and we thought we could take it into something to benefit the environment," said Tom Wainick, director of membership and corporate relations at SCORE, the American Council on Renewable Energy, one of the four environmental groups that launched the Green Cup. "You don't have to be austere to be green — you can live your normal life, and you can even be sleek and chic," Wainick said.

Event coordinators worked to determine how much energy would be consumed during the event — for example, how much greenhouse gas would be emitted by people driving to the event. Through efforts, to include the attendees taking to reduce pollution, were donated by the Portland, Ore.-based Climate Clean in order to counter-balance the emissions. Coordinators also incorporated green practices into many elements of the planning process — which translates into attendees using recycling and composting, food donated by local, organic restaurants, an option for using to and from the event on a hybrid bus provided by EcoRide, biodegradable serving trays, and the use of soy-based ink and recycled paper for printed materials.

Music for the day was provided by the Pocket Playlist, a rock and reggae group that works to spread the message about green living and minimize their carbon footprint at shows.

The Green Cup was a step in the direction of making green living part of an everyday lifestyle.
